It premiered on Fox on November 2, 2003. In the episode, George Sr. is about to announce his retirement when he is arrested for using his company funds for personal expenses. The film was written by series creator and executive producer Mitchell Horwitz and directed by Anthony and Joe Russo. An esoevertible, extended version of the episode was released as a special feature on the DVD home release. [1] Plot for ten years, Michael Bluth waited for his father, George Sr., to make him a partner in their family company. On the morning of his father's retirement boat party, Michael discussed announcing his promotion with his son, George Michael. They both live in one of the Bluths' modelling houses, so they'll sweat their support for the business. After dropping his son off at the frozen banana stand his father set up, Michael goes to see his older brother Gob (amateur magician), to ask for his check to cover the party's expenses. Gob tells Michael that their sister Lindsay stayed at the Four Seasons for a month. Michael is angry about Lindsay's avoidance of him and her abuse of the company's greatness, Michael goes to tell his mother, Lucille, that the company's checkbook is closing. Next to the banana stand, George Michael's cousin Maebly pranks him, taking advantage of the fact that he doesn't recognize her. The children discuss how they never see each other, and Maybe suggests they kiss during the boat party to teach their parents that cousins should see each other more often. Back at the hotel, Lindsay's husband Tobias believes the boat party is a pirated theme because of a joke from Michael, starting to try on Lindsay's shirts. He confuses a group of garishly dressed men with pirates, and boards a van full of gay protesters. Finally, George Sr. gives his retirement speech, appointing the new CEO: his wife Lucille. Desperate Michael decides it's time to move on. The family poses for a picture; Maebly continues with her earlier bid and kisses George Michael while the SEC raids the ship. George Sr. calls his secretary with instructions on what to do. Lindsay takes charge of the boat and Lucille tells Buster, her youngest son, to find a channel to the ocean on maps. Buster, despite his cartography rates, can only offer certainty that the blue part of the map is soil before a panic attack begins. The SEC drags George Bluth and leaves the family in turmoil. At the police station, Tobias joins The family told them that he found out that the men he was in the other boat with were actually actors from the local theater. Tobias, who believes a path has been shown to him, informs the family that he has decided to become an actor. Michael informs the family that their father is being held in prison, and Securities Housing halts the company's expense account. Lucille decides to put Buster in charge. That's too much for Michael, who gets a job in Arizona with a competing development company. When Buster discovers that his academic pursuits didn't prepare him to run a large company, the family turns to Michael and begs for his help. Michael postpones their toss, but Lindsay says he needs to visit their father before he leaves. Michael does visit his father in prison, asking why he wasn't put in charge. George informs him that he put Lucille in charge because he believes they can't arrest a husband and wife for the same crime. Michael tells him that's not true, and George curses the advice of his lawyers. At a model house, Lindsay tries to steal some stuff she can grab and sell when she bumps into George Michael. He opens his heart, says he hopes the family can see each other more often, and when Michael sees it, he decides to stay in California and try to save the family business. In the next detainee development... George Michael is starting to feel awkward. Gob is interviewed for a job at the rival development company michael interviewed earlier, and in county jail, George Sr. tells Michael he's having fun. A development discussion that led to the creation of the series began in the summer of 2002. Ron Howard had the original idea to create a comedy in the style of hand cameras and reality TV, but with an elaborate and highly comic script that was drawn from repeated scriptures and repetitions. Howard met with David Wynnms, president of Imagine TELEVISION, Katie O'Connell, senior vice president, and two writers, including Mitchell Horwitz. In light of recent corporate accounting scandals, such as Enron and Adlafia, Horwitz offered a story about a wealth family for rags. Howard and Imagine were immediately interested in using this idea, and semanied Horwitz to write the show. The idea was proposed and sold in the fall of 2002. In the months that followed, Horwitz developed the characters and the plot for the series. The pilot script was submitted in January 2003 and filmed in March 2003. It was filed in late April, and added to Fox's fall schedule in May. Tony Hale, who plays Buster, recalled that we didn't really improvise that much, because we knew [Mitchell Horwitz] had a specific way he wanted it done. [3] Casting the hardest part of casting the series involved finding people would be trusted as a family. Alia Shukt was the first person to be cast. Michael Cera, Tony Hale and Jessica Walter were cast Videotapes and airlifted for an audition for Fox. Jason Bateman and Portia De Rossi read and tested for the net and were immediately selected. Gob's character was the most challenging to cast. When Will Arnett auditioned, he described the character with a macho streak different from expectations; He was chosen immediately. The characters of Tobias and George Sr. originally had minor roles, but the portrayals of David Cross and Jeffrey Tambor mixed well with the other characters, and they were given more significant roles. Ron Howard, the executive producer, provided the narration for the initial pilot, but fit in so well with the tone of the show that the decision was made to stick to his voice. Howard also assisted in the casting of Lucille 2; Producers told him their dream actress for the role would be Liza Minnelli, but assumed no one in his position would take the role. However, she agreed when Ron Howard asked her himself that they were old friends; She was his babysitter when he was a kid and she was a teenager. Critical welcome New York Times critic Alessandra Stanley said the comparisons to Royal Tenenbaum were unfair, noting that arresting development had brought down the film's high development. Praising the dry, moderate tone and unconventional satire, she said the humor lies in balancing the characters' loop with self-weary, satisfying digs at the rich. Tim Goodman praised the film's quality and comedic beauty while praising Bateman's performance as incredibly wonderful. Goodman also said the series was too funny to survive, comparing it to the recently canceled series Andy Richter dominating the universe. Matt Roche of TV Guide said the pilot proved sophisticated and invigorated his close wit and blandness and free flashbacks and praised the lack of a laugh track. Robert Bianco of USA Today wrote a largely positive review, and was impressed by the performances of the entire cast of the ensemble, but called Bateman the standout. However, he felt the series had gone too far from the norm with the george-michael cousin's plot to Maebly, treating it as alarming. Writes the A.V. Club. Noel Murray wrote that the show's premiere had made good use of its time, saying that among its on-screen titles, narration, quick insertion shots, short flashbacks and quick dialogue, creator Mitchell Horwitz and his team of writers, directors and editors provide massive amounts of information in a short period of time. [9] Pilot accolades won the 56th annual Emmy Award. Mitchell Horwitz won outstanding writing for a comedy series about writing the pilot episode. During his acceptance speech, Horwitz joked: It's such an honor, and I'm afraid, a huge mistake. Joe and Anthony Russo also won the Outstanding Directing Award for Comedy Series for their directing work in this episode.
